

Why Unmarried Couples Need Domestic Partnership Agreements: A 7-Part Series

August 31, 2015

By Michael P. Sampson and

Edith G. Osman *Many couples who could not marry now can. The United States Supreme Court decision in Obergefell v. Hodges framed the issue of the fundamental right to marry and the choice to commit to and intimately associate with the person you love through marriage as one of identity and liberty. But thousands of people in committed intimate relationships choose not to exercise their right to marry, but to remain happily-ever unmarried. Their identity and liberty interests allow them that choice. Property and support issues are no less important to people who choose to stay unmarried in committed relationships. Domestic partnership agreements can protect committed couples who remain unmarried, just as premarital agreements do for marrying couples. In this series, we provide an overview of domestic partnership agreements and the legal issues couples typically face. These include rights related to the home where they'll live during their relationship; paying joint bills; handling separate property, and property the couple may acquire during their relationship; support if the relationship ends; death; and financial disclosures. Finally, we answer common questions about domestic partnership agreements.* Domestic Partnership Agreements: Overview

Premarital agreements, also known as “prenuptial” or “antenuptial” agreements, express the wishes of a marrying couple regarding their property and support rights upon (i) death of one party or (ii) divorce or separation. As part of the estate planning each party's family may have done, assets may have been transferred into one or more trusts or business entities for each party's benefit. One goal of estate planning is to retain control of family companies and other assets within the immediate family. Provisions in the agreements should be consistent with this goal. Beyond the issue of the ownership of family companies and interests in trusts, domestic partnership agreements often include provisions for a joint household account; support alternatives; alternative provisions upon death; and provisions about keeping the contents of the agreement private. The agreement will define and cause, if the relationship ends, each party's interests in separate assets and family trusts and in other property to be deemed each party's separate property. A second goal will be to clarify that the agreement will treat as each party's separate property, unless either party directs otherwise, the income, distributions, dividends, appreciation, and benefits from each party's separate property. The agreement should describe each party's ownership interests and trust interests in which either party may acquire rights and benefits during the parties' relationship. It will provide for waiving interests if the relationship ends. The domestic partnership agreements series continues with the following segments:

- The home and joint expenses
- Separate property and jointly acquired property
- Support upon termination of the relationship
- Survivor's rights on death
- Financial disclosures and privacy
- Frequently asked questions

©2024 Carlton Fields, P.A. Carlton Fields practices law in California through Carlton Fields, LLP. Carlton Fields publications should not be construed as legal advice on any specific facts or circumstances. The contents are intended for general information and educational purposes only, and should not be relied on as if it were advice about a particular fact situation. The distribution of this publication is not intended to create, and receipt of it does not constitute, an attorney-client relationship with Carlton Fields. This publication may not be quoted or referred to in any other publication or proceeding without the prior written consent of the firm, to be given or withheld at our discretion. To request reprint permission for any of our publications, please use our Contact Us form via the link below. The views set forth herein are the personal views of the author and do not necessarily reflect those of the firm. This site may contain hypertext links to information created and maintained by other entities. Carlton Fields does not control or guarantee the accuracy or completeness of this outside information, nor is the inclusion of a link to be intended as an endorsement of those outside sites.