

Preserving Violations of Orders Granting Motions in Limine: Object Contemporaneously or Forever Hold Your Peace

May 25, 2021

You file a motion in limine seeking to preclude certain arguments during closing. The court grants your motion. In closing argument, opposing counsel violates the ruling. Must you contemporaneously object to the argument that violates the ruling to preserve the issue for appeal? Lest there be any doubt, the Georgia Supreme Court has answered that question with a resounding "yes." A contemporaneous objection must be made at the time a violation of the order granting the motion in limine occurs at trial - whether during the presentation of evidence or in opening statements or closing arguments - to preserve the issue for appeal. In Williams v. Harvey, after the jury had returned a verdict and judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff, the defendants filed a motion for a new trial in which they argued, for the first time, that plaintiff's counsel violated several of the court's motion in limine rulings during closing argument, including those prohibiting arguments intended primarily to inflame the emotions of the jury and violations of the "golden rule." After the trial court denied the defendants' new trial motion, the defendants appealed. The Georgia Court of Appeals reversed, holding that, although the defendants did not make a contemporaneous objection, plaintiff's counsel made an improper and prejudicial statement in closing argument that clearly violated the trial court's order granting the defendants' motion in limine. This month, the Georgia Supreme Court reversed that decision, emphasizing the importance of the contemporaneous objection rule - which allows the trial court to correct error when it occurs, thereby reducing the likelihood of appeal - and stating that "there is no reason to review unpreserved claims of error in closing argument in civil cases." The court expressly overruled Stolte v. Fagan, and other cases that had been relied on for the proposition that some appellate review of improper closing argument was available even if the issue was unpreserved. The court also held that the defendants would have been required to contemporaneously object in any event because the particular motion in limine at issue "was so vague and overly broad as to render it virtually meaningless as a vehicle to decide an issue before it was raised in context at trial" and found no abuse of discretion in the trial court's determination that the plaintiff's statement during closing argument was not a violation of the ruling on the defendants' motion in limine.

Practice Tips:

- Specificity is paramount. If you file a motion in limine, point the trial court to specifically prejudicial evidence or argument, rather than simply asking it to follow the law. This becomes important if you need to challenge the court's ruling but also if you need to claim a violation of the in limine ruling.
- If opposing counsel violates an in limine ruling during trial, don't wait to raise the issue until after the jury's reached a verdict. Ask for a sidebar if you're worried about the optics of contemporaneous objections during opening statement or closing argument.

Authored By

Stephanie Chau

Peter D. Webster

Related Practices

Appellate & Trial Support

©2024 Carlton Fields, P.A. Carlton Fields practices law in California through Carlton Fields, LLP. Carlton Fields publications should not be construed as legal advice on any specific facts or circumstances. The contents are intended for general information and educational purposes only, and should not be relied on as if it were advice about a particular fact situation. The distribution of this publication is not intended to create, and receipt of it does not constitute, an attorney-client relationship with Carlton Fields. This publication may not be quoted or referred to in any other publication or proceeding without the prior written consent of the firm, to be given or withheld at our discretion. To request reprint permission for any of our publications, please use our Contact Us form via the link below. The views set forth herein are the personal views of the author and do not necessarily reflect those of the firm. This site may contain hypertext links to information created and maintained by other entities. Carlton Fields does not control or guarantee the accuracy or completeness of this outside information, nor is the inclusion of a link to be intended as an endorsement of those outside sites.

